The window we landed on

Your most likely birth time falls between 9:40 pm and 10:30 pm on 7 June 1958 — an evening with Sagittarius rising. Six of the thirty-six ten-minute steps we tested cluster inside that fifty-minute band, and they cluster for the same reasons, which is the kind of agreement that gives a result weight.

I want to be straightforward with you: this narrows the time, it does not pin it to the minute. A fifty-minute window is a real and useful result — it fixes your rising sign, the house framework, and the broad shape of your planetary periods. It is not the same as a hospital record.

Why this window holds together

The method is simple to describe even if the arithmetic behind it isn't. For each candidate time we build the chart, run the planetary periods (daśā) forward, and ask: in the year you actually reported something happening, was the ruling period a planet that governs or occupies the part of the chart that matter belongs to? We also check how the rising sign sits with your build and temperament, and we run a classical timing check called prāṇapada, which tests whether a subtle point derived from the Sun and the hour falls in a supportive angle from the rising sign.

Across this window, ten dated events line up again and again through the same long chapters: a Jupiter period covering your late teens into the mid-eighties, and a long Saturn period covering the mid-nineties into the 2000s. That continuity is what makes the window coherent rather than accidental.

22:20 — the leading candidate

Sagittarius rising, 13°24'. Highest total support of all thirty-six.

- 1978, your first major career step falls inside the Jupiter major period, with Jupiter sitting in a house relevant to work and standing in the world.
- 1984, recognition or promotion is the single strongest fit in the whole set. Jupiter — ruler of a relevant house, occupant of one, and the natural significator of honour and advancement — is running as the major period, with Rahu, also placed in a relevant house, running underneath it. Three independent reasons pointing the same way.
- 1985, starting your venture continues that Jupiter–Rahu pairing, which reads naturally as expansion with appetite.
- 1996, marriage and the birth of your child in the same year. Venus is running as the sub-period — ruler of the partnership house and the natural significator of marriage — inside a Saturn major period that also rules a relevant house. The same Venus sub-period occupies a house connected with children, which is why one sub-period accounts cleanly for both events in one year.
- 2001, a second partnership, under Rahu's sub-period within that Saturn chapter.
- 2000 and 2006, the two separations. The first comes under Mars, the natural significator of rupture and friction, within Saturn's larger chapter; the second under a Mercury major and sub-period, where Mercury both rules and occupies houses tied to the matter. Two different separations, two different and appropriate signatures — not one explanation stretched twice.
- 2001 and 2002, your father's and mother's passing, both inside the Saturn major period, with Saturn placed in a relevant house and carrying its traditional role as the significator of endings and of elders.
- Temperament: a fiery disposition sits naturally with Sagittarius rising, a fire sign ruled by Jupiter.
- Prāṇapada falls in the 7th from the rising sign — an angle, which the classical check treats as supportive.

21:40 — the other end of the same window

Sagittarius rising, 4°01'. Nearly the same chart, nearly the same evidence.

Everything listed above holds here too, with one difference: at 21:40 the period boundaries sit a little earlier, so the 1984 recognition falls under Jupiter alone rather than Jupiter with Rahu beneath it. It's still a strong fit — just one supporting voice fewer. This is why the whole 21:40–22:30 band is reported as a window rather than a point. Forty minutes of birth time moves the Moon enough to shift the period boundaries slightly, and 1984 is the year where that shift shows.

18:00 — the honest alternative

Libra rising, 20°12'. Score 24 against 26 — close enough that I won't dismiss it.

This chart also explains your life creditably: Jupiter ruling a relevant house for 1978 and 1985, the Sun as both ruler and natural significator of recognition in 1984, Saturn covering the long stretch from the mid-nineties through both parents' passing in 2001 and 2002, and its own supportive prāṇapada placement in the 5th. It is not a weak chart. What it lacks is the trait fit — a fiery temperament doesn't belong to Libra, an air sign ruled by Venus — and it explains 1996 and the 2000 separation more thinly, through single contacts rather than converging ones.

So the evening Sagittarius window wins, but on points, not by knockout.

About the inheritance that never came

You told us there was no inheritance or windfall. That was weighed gently, as it should be — and in the end it didn't separate any of the candidates from each other. No chart in this set was ruled in or out by it. It is simply one more fact about a life, held alongside the rest, with no weight placed on it beyond what it can honestly bear.

What's still open, and what would close it

Three honest gaps:

1. Within the window, 22:20 and 21:40 differ mainly in where the 1984 sub-period boundary falls. If you can recall whether that recognition came early or late in 1984 — even the season — it would push the estimate toward one end.
2. Against 18:00, the deciding evidence is mostly in your temperament, and a single trait match is a thin thread. A physical marker would help more: Sagittarius and Libra rising give noticeably different impressions, and an astrologer looking at you in person weighs that better than a scoring routine can.
3. One more dated event — any year you can fix with confidence, a move, an illness, a significant beginning — would test the two charts against each other directly, since their period sequences diverge.

The standard next step, and the one I'd recommend, is for an astrologer to check this window against the navāṃśa — the finer divisional chart, which changes far more quickly than the rising sign and is the usual instrument for settling a fifty-minute band down to a tighter one.

Where this leaves you

A computed, evidence-backed starting point: evening birth, 9:40–10:30 pm, Sagittarius rising, with 10:20 pm the single best-supported step. Ten dated events line up through it without strain, and the classical timing check agrees. That is a real foundation — enough to work from, and enough for a practitioner sitting with you to confirm, refine, or respectfully revise.

Bring it to them as a hypothesis with good reasons behind it, not as a verdict. That's exactly what it is.

A NOTE FROM YOUR ASTROLOGER

A sample rectification. Prince Rogers Nelson was born on June 7, 1958 in Minneapolis; the recorded time is 18:17, which this sweep is not told. It is run from the part of the day (evening) and the dated events of his public life, so the reader can judge how close the texts come.
